THE CONVENTION.

The Grounds of 1868.

THE OUTSIDE PRESSURE.

New York, July 5, 1895.

Mr. Editor:—The great city of New York is for once full of excitement. Nearly every hotel is crowded, and the residences of those who offer to entertain their democratic country cousins echo in the sound of unaccustomed voices. The streets are thronged with delegates and people from all the different States of the Union, and every man, delegate and visitor, exhibits the great, high interest felt in the action of the convention. The entire city has on its post-mortem clothes and extends to the representatives of the National Democracy a magnificent welcome. From the drinking saloons and beer shops, put on an unusual appearance of respectability, and are re-stocked with the best approved democratic beverages. But for the daily bluster of the Tribune, and like organs, one would not know that there was a Radical in the vast city, so generous is the welcome, and so enthusiastic are everybody. Parlor me, if in my country democratic way, I go outside of politics, and express to you the view, that some of this great enthusiasm is caused by the excessive force of Pendleton and other aspirants' whisky. I verily believe that two thirds of New York is anxious, or drinking establishments in some shape, and that a majority of these are owned or chartered by the different candidates for the nomination. I acknowledge that I myself feel much more enthusiastic and patriotic than when I arrived here; but to insure you of the impartiality of my views, I should state that I do not consume drinking to Pendleton, Hancock or any other man's saloon, but follow gallantly wherever touches me upon the arm. I do not wield, perhaps, as much influence here, as Gov. Stevenson or Mr. Trimble, and such men, but there is a one around the New York and Metropolitan that do not know it, and, sometimes I feel like a little potentate with the eye of the Kentucky Purchase upon me. You bet!

THE NOMINEES.

Before you receive this you will have heard who the nominees are, and hence I shall not occupy your space with any of the speculations now rife. One glorious fact I may state as certain is, that notwithstanding the warm differences now felt and urged, the nominee, whoever he is, will receive the hearty support of all. As an outsider, however, we will not do you something of the workings of the friends of the different aspirants, so that you may judge of how Presidents are made.

In a review of the candidates Pendleton comes first, because his strength is organized and positive. Holding a confessed majority, his friends urge him upon the score of availability, citing as proof that in all recent State elections where the democracy have resorted to war they have been defeated, but when they have nominated men of positive democratic antecedents they have always triumphed.

But the opposition, in which we may class all the other candidates now spoken of, put it up differently. They argue that if we can carry the election against Radicalism, it makes little difference on what platform or with what candidate, that the great duty of our party is to effect a change of policy by defeating its election, and that in order to do so we must induce some citizen to act with us who have formerly acted with the Republicans, urging that the ticket will be supported any how and that unless we can accomplish this year's return shows that we shall be defeated. That if we take things by the right end and succeed, we shall when in power have little difficulty in establishing any reasonable policy. Under this view comes up a chance for Hancock, Johnson, Chase, or some compromise man, and at this writing I am forced to believe this compromise idea will beat the Pendletonians, who will be the lucky man, things are so mixed, I can't now say. Johnson, Hancock, Chase, Seymour, and all the other aspirants, depend upon the vote from the Southern and Eastern States, which is not united upon any. The Southern States are willing to support any one the North may put forward, but the Eastern democrats are strong in their opposition to Pendleton and his groundwork policy. The Pendleton men failing to nominate their ticket, can not doubtly control the result of the convention, and nominate any man they choose. If Pendleton and Johnson, or Pendleton and Hancock, would combine their strength, a nomination of their choice could be effected; or if Chase, Seymour, Hendricks, Johnson and Hancock, combine, they may perhaps work the Pendletonians into accepting a ticket from them.

THE NORTHWESTERN RAILROAD.

Hickman, July 10, 1895.

Mr. Editor:—Here, on an eminence overlooking the town of Hickman, I have a view of the Great Father of Rivers, and between me and the great expanse of waters, is a railway track, the trunk line of connection between the city of Nashville and Hickman, lying lifeless and useless. The first, the great work of men, and the finished stroke of a mauler's mallet.

From this eminence, I behold the desolated regions in their warehouses and stores, back to the office of the town, and between me and the great expanse of waters, is a railway track, the trunk line of connection between the city of Nashville and Hickman, lying lifeless and useless.
